Large air emboli can be challenging to identify or to diagnose intraoperatively or in the postoperative period. We report the occurrence of a massive venous air embolism (MAE) during an emergency surgery under general anesthesia and its successful management. A 55-year-old male patient was scheduled for emergency surgery, and was premedicated with palonosetron before induction of anesthesia. The induction was performed with propofol and the maintenance with 0.5% sevoflurane and remifentanyl. A bolus of propofol was administered to maintain anesthesia after the surgery. The patient presented a MAE during the surgery that could be identified only by a thoracic CT-scan performed in the postoperative period. Reversal of the anesthesia was performed with 0.5 mg of atropine, 30 mg of etomidate, 125 mg of tranexamic acid, and 1,000 mg of fresh frozen plasma. On the postoperative day 1, the patient was discharged without further complications. The perioperative MAE diagnosis is challenging and is sometimes difficult even with radiological evaluation 3da54e8ca3
