The updates to Apple's developer tools follow Wednesday's launch of an update to iOS 8 that makes it easier for users to manage separate devices that have been upgraded to use Apple's latest operating system. For years, developers have had to code each separate device to enable separate user accounts or a single account shared across multiple devices. But Apple updated to the new iOS 8, meaning the company's default is a new user account with the iCloud account across all new devices. The issue has long been a concern for developers of games and apps who may want to distribute to families with multiple iPhones. So when Apple first launched the iCloud in 2011, it added the ability for users to designate apps and content. But users had to download and install the app on each device to create the initial user account, and the process wasn't always clear to users. For example, if a user wanted to designate items from their games or applications for an iCloud account, they needed to download and install the app. But this creates the new account. To create a second iCloud account on another iOS device, a user had to download and install the app again. The latest update to Apple's developer tools makes one-click iOS 3da54e8ca3
